SPARC's Campus-based Publishing Partnerships: A Guide to Critical Issues

- Campus-based publishing partnerships offer the academy greater control over the intellectual products that it helps create. To fully realize this potential, such partnerships will need to evolve from informal working alliances to long-term, programmatic collaborations.

- Establishing governance and administrative structures;
- Identifying funding models that accommodate the objectives of both libraries and presses;
- Defining a partnership's objectives to align the missions of the library and the press;
- Determining what services to provide; and
- Demonstrating the value of the collaboration.

Back To Basics: Diving Deep into Patron Service and Public Services OK-ACRL Nov 11th 2016 Rose State

Archives in Action: What Kind of Animal is It

The opportunities to strengthen our relevance and center our value to our campus communities has never been stronger. The rise of digital publishing and scholarly communication as issues in academic librarianship and university life are both lively and multifaceted. There are many faculty and students on our campuses who are publishing in the digital environment, either through the mechanisms of traditional peer-reviewed journals, web publication, and even paper and ink. These university publications, until recently, have existed in most part as fragmented and disconnected coalitions, but with the rise of digital archive platforms publishing has come back to the library. The ability to create an umbrella for scholarly and creative work produced on our campuses is now an ascendant reality, and is bringing new patrons into the library. It is the process of discovery for these works, and the metrics that go along with these processes, that is creating a space for libraries to assume a central role in the scholarly conversation that is higher education.

In our presentation we will highlight the work being done at the Al Harris Library in relation to three very different types of journals being published on our campus at SWOSU. We have created new service models to expand the range and presence of the library for these university patrons. In a historical sense publishing manuscripts was once central to libraries, getting back to basics, we are doing so again.

How do you center your patrons in your service model? In what innovative ways are you bringing them in the door? What does your new customer focused staff training look like? Share with us your ideas about Diving Deep into Patron Service and Public Services. Brainstorm and submit a proposal to present at the 2016 OKACRL Conference.
