SWOSU Reminds Area Residents about Use of Campus Facilities as Volunteer Storm Shelters

When tornadic/stormy conditions exist, Southwestern Oklahoma State University reminds Weatherford residents to plan to seek shelter at home or in a personal shelter.

SWOSU has nearly 5,000 students on campus, and in the Weatherford area during most times of the year, its facilities cannot serve as volunteer storm shelters.

“Our severe weather shelter plans are in place to ensure the safety and security of our students, faculty and staff, a portion of which are working or living on campus 24-hours a day,” said Kendra Brown, director of public safety at SWOSU.

During a recent storm in Weatherford, two areas—basement of the Al Harris Library and Old Science Building—were heavily packed with people. Some residents brought animals, which resulted in some problems. SWOSU officials remind people who utilize the shelters that pets—unless they are service animals—are not allowed.

Brown said the recent experience led to a realization by administrators that the university should clarify its shelter policy to the public, as offering volunteer shelters could lead to a number of challenges.

“People could get to campus and be unable to access campus shelters because they are full or not open if a storm occurs outside of normal business hours, and they could put their lives at risk by getting into their vehicles and traveling to campus. We feel we are better serving our community by encouraging residents to plan where they will seek shelter now,” Brown said.

The university does have designated primary and alternate shelter areas for students, faculty and staff to utilize during severe weather, as well as plans to open specific shelters for on-campus residents should a storm occur outside of normal business hours.
