In Baba Yaga’s Garden

by

Janet Brennan Croft

“I see no reason for you to be so sad, my dear,” the therapist smiled. “You’re both making such progress,” she said. Why, in today’s session alone Your husband has learned ten new ways to torment you. “When you are a little down, you must simply think of your happy place And go there. Promise me you will do that.” They both beamed at me. Do not think, do not think, do not think of the inescapable fact of him. Do not rage. Go to your happy place instead.

“My happy place, yes,” I murmured. “I will.” The high hedge of bones and thorns is prowled about by snakes, owls, hedgehogs, cats, familiars and protectors out of the old tales. Soon I’ll go down and tidy away those ragged red and white ribbons flying from it so gaily, the ones the ravens sport with. But the breeze is too lovely right now. I sit on the high veranda, sipping wine, adrift on the light dappling the leaves below. Behind me in the house, peace and order, rest and useful work, time and space, room to breathe, light, silence, what I will. The house shifts a bit on its legs; cauldrons and knives settle back in their accustomed places. On the fencepost far below, his skull bleaches; crows picking it clean, clean, finally all clean. I think idly about what I shall build of his bones. I may need more.

“I will make sure there’s a place there where I can come and talk with you, Doctor. And thank you for all you’ve done.”

Can you feel the house move?
