Nights Like This

by

R. L. Boyer

On summer nights like this, the Moon grows full,
Grows thick with faery light, with fragrant depths
Of roses. The soul wakes then upon a bed of Dreams, sets out from the lost islands of sleep
Through pathless forests to wrest from unyielding Hands of angels the numinous treasure-spoils of Ninevah. Beneath footprints grown deep like Roots of ancient trees, the mystic path is lit by Golden boughs as the underworld groans
Through the molten cores of island-forming Stones. On nights like this, the soul descends in Spirals, plummets down the vast abyss—falling,
Dreams of roses and the music of the sea.
