Growing Young

Dennis Ross
Growing Young
by Dennis Ross

Young people are immortal do not believe a time will come when taking their FJR 1300 cycle to the max on poor rubber will seem imprudent, when joints ache and stairs become an assault on Everest, when pepperoni pizza is not manna from a beneficent god.

The possibility of mortality sneaks up slowly at first then with unstoppable authority with an aortic aneurysm or stroke, but a trapdoor opens, you tumble down a rabbit hole, and end up floating down in a crystal blue sky.

The frantic dance slows, sunlight ripples from the wings of a bee hovering over Queen Anne’s Lace, a black snake slips quietly into the pond, small voices call again as they did as a child, the world opens out from a hard bud with crawling black ants into a peony.
What matters that the blossom will not last forever?