Radio Night

Wulf Losee

Follow this and additional works at: https://dc.swosu.edu/westview

Part of the Fiction Commons, Nonfiction Commons, Photography Commons, and the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation Available at: https://dc.swosu.edu/westview/vol33/iss1/17

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the Journals at SWOSU Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Westview by an authorized administrator of SWOSU Digital Commons. For more information, please contact phillip.fitzsimmons@swosu.edu.
Radio Night
by Wulf Losee

The radio night chatters on and on a preacher expounds upon the end times rumors of the eschaton drift across the continent as his empty voice phases in and out on the flutter of the nighttime ionosphere.

In the sidebands beside him I hear voices rising in a murmur callers and the talkers banked on frequencies and cranked to amphetamine heights across the longitudes of night.

I hunt along the dial for music to match my mood and the rhythm of my road-weary thoughts, but each station is the same;
the songs repeat themselves with contemptuous familiarity; their echoed notes and lyrics blur into a single chord of inchoate longing.

Shut the radio off!

My thoughts pursue the caffeine’s parallax until I finally reach the jangled edge of concentration where headlights rush to jump the divider before the highway’s curve pulls them aside; they become red trails in my mirror, the scattered light seeds from a torch.
At midnight I halt in a high plains town but I lie awake in the motel in starched sheets that smell of bleach, and my thoughts are drawn like frantic moths to the seam of sodium vapor light that blasts through the gap in the drapes, bisects my bedspread, like a searchlight from the parking lot.

I listen to the rushing whisper of the highway, and I think of the multitudes of people traveling on the road before me, and on the road behind me, their movements hidden from me, except as the dopplered sound of displaced air.
Then I hear the stuttering groan of a truck as it hits the downgrade, and that is my last thought before sleep.