Radiance

Radiance

by

Robert Franz

Walking by, a gentle flowing, features compose a tapestry in the wind, leaving streams of pure color in her wake across the snowy lawn. I call, the sharp crack of a word that perturbs my waking thoughts: her name. Not staring but sharing the soul that lies just inside eyes that sparkle crisp, piercing daily airs to understand the core humanity that is me.
Simple conversation turns quickly to a willful surrender to the beckoning call of the soul that rests behind the twinkling pools, opening itself up unto my own. She stands in confidence; my guards fall and walls collapse to the features soft as meadow's grass. Smiles bring inescapable waves of elation, ecstasies that prove addicting to my heart, an image immediately etched forever in marble mind. Speech in the cold morning light begets visible wisps, I am immobilized with yearning for my lips to trace them to source. As brief communication comes to a close she turns, floating off into the cool brisk of day, having said so much more than was spoken.
