Some Notes to The Letters of J.R.R. Tolkien

Benjamin Urrutia

It is a great joy to read the Letters of Professor Tolkien, not only because of the answers provided to many mysteries and long-standing questions about Middle-earth, but mostly because of the glimpses into his soul. One is deeply touched by his loving counsel to his children, cheered by his refusal to supply potential publishers in Germany with an affidavit of "Aryan" descent. One marvels at his patience in the face of afflictions and his willingness to answer innumerable impertinent questions from near and far. Before reading his correspondence, I thought Professor Tolkien to have been a great writer and a good man. Now, I suspect he was a great man as well.

The notes are excellent. One only wishes that there were more of them, for not all the allusions are perfectly clear. With the humble desire of helping others to better understand the words of Professor Tolkien, I present here some of the notes that could be added to the letters, with the hope that others will be stimulated to do the same.

Letter 131, page 151. Without consulting the text, can you pick out the words which have been inserted in the following excerpt? "There was nothing wrong essentially in their lingering against counsel, still sadly in love with the mortal lands of their old heroic deeds. " The editorial note at this point comments: "...it appears that here the typist has omitted some words from Tolkien's MS." The reconstruction here offered is of course purely conjectural, but I think it makes good sense.

Letter 153, pages 187, 188, 192, 193. Elvish reincarnation is hinted at elsewhere (see Letter 131, page 147: "...never leaving it even when 'slain' but returning...") and clearly spelled out on pages 236 and 286 (though the Index omits these). The possibility is raised that Glorfindel, who helped Frodo, may be the same as the Glorfindel of The Silmarillion, reincarnated.

Letter 154, page 197. The Gondorians became "a withering people whose only 'hallows' were their tombs." There have been such people in history. At Kaminaljuyu, Guatemala, from the 5th to the 3rd centuries B.C., the central sacred area consisted of large burial mounds in rows, instead of a temple. (See Pennsylvanina State University Department of Anthropology, Occasional Papers in Anthropology No. 2, May 1969, page 165). This is an example of the Hopewell culture, which existed from about 300 B.C. to ca. 400-500 A.D. in what today is the Midwest of the United States (Ohio and surrounding states) had huge and elaborate burial mounds. They had no temples or shrines. In fact, they lived in small clusters of houses. The evidence indicates they were hunters and gatherers. Yet their huge sepulchre-mounds are filled with hundreds of valuable goods brought from great distances. The practice ceased, apparently, when they learned agriculture and they no longer had time for such things.

Letter 171, note 1, page 446. It seems rather illogical to say that "thou wost" is the second person singular of the first person singular. It would be more accurate to say: "Second person singular of the verb 'to wit' (I wot, thou wost...)."

Letter 180, page 324. Appearance of orcs: the page is listed incorrectly as "174" in the Index.

is, to write) "probably makes me at my worst [as a critic] when the other writer's lines come too near (as do your best times): there is liable to be a short circuit, a flash, an explosion -- and even a bad smell, one ingredient of which may be jealousy". In this outline of the event, Lewis presumably read some of his book at an Inklings' meeting, partly in terms of the Lewis/Tolkien radio play "The Emperor's Clothes" (as Roger Lancelyn Green reported Tolkien saying later in the year), which might be what Lewis called hyper-critical, and partly because Lewis was invading his area of mythological fantasy. At any rate, he followed up whatever he said at the meeting with a poem and a letter -- perhaps a poem at the next meeting, at which time Lewis attacked it ("the verbal butchery"), and a follow-up letter. Presumably Lewis, when he realized how far they had gone, offered to stop reading his works at the Inklings; hence, Tolkien asks him to "bring out OHEN [English Literature was in the Oxford History of English Literature series], with no, no, no." Either interpretation is conjecture, but the latter at least ties to a known difference between Tolkien and Lewis in 1948.

Two poems by Tolkien are quoted in this volume: the epigraph of The Lord of the Rings ("The Ring is under the Sky"), p. 153; and one of his clerihews on the Inklings -- this one of Coghill ("Mr. Neville [sic] Judson Coghill"), p. 359. The latter is published for the first time.

Youngberg's annotated checklist of secondary materials on Sayers, arranged by year, is a good, professional job. Her annotated list of reviews shows amazing thoroughness, although she misses those of Nancy-Lou Patterson on Sayersana in Mythprint and Mythprint; C. S. Lewis, xi, 53, 63, 68, 73, 75, 82, 93, 96, 100, 113, 116, 129, 138, 140, 141; W. H. Lewis, 9-10, 40, 138, 148; W. Tolkien, 9-10, 148; Wain, 93: Williams, xi, 10, 22, 50, 64, 69, 77, 80, 82, 86, 91, 96, 97, 113, 116, 119, 148; Inklings generally, 93, 96, 97, 103, 111, 125, 139, 152.

Youngberg's "Introduction" she mentions the critics who complain of the influence of Lewis and Williams on Sayers' thinking about Dante (p. xi). There is a large number of writers who happily associate her with Lewis and Williams -- and sometimes Tolkien -- as Christian writers. These seem to start in 1947 with Edward Wagennecht (1947-16, p. 63), comparing her to Lewis only. James O. Supple (1949-50, p. 119) and Ray H. Rambee (1969-6, p. 100) thinks of Lewis and Tolkien; W. W. Robson, in Modern English Literature (1970-7, p. 103), associates her with "Anglo-Oxford"; George L. Scherer (1973-17, p. 113) and Bastian Kruithof (1974-9, p. 116), with both Lewis and Williams; and an anonymous reviewer (1978-9, p. 139), with the Inklings. Most of the foregoing comparisons are in reviews, which because of their treatment of Sayers have escaped the bibliographers of Lewis, Tolkien, and Williams. Of course, there are more serious discussions of Sayers' relationships with one or more of these writers: Kathleen Nott's attack on Sayers and Lewis (1954-4, p. 73) is well known, as are -- in a more positive way -- Charles Moorman's study of Sayers' literary relationship to Williams, in particular, in Tolken, the Inklings, the New Oxford History of English Literature series, with no, no, no; and Lawrence W. Cobb's "A Gift from the Sky: The Creative Process in Lewis and Sayers" (1978-10, p. 141) was mimeographed only.

Some primary material by Lewis and Williams appears. Williams reviews Sayers' Strong Poison (1930-140) and -- Youngberg relates -- contents of this review to annotate -- The Nine Tailors (1934-23, p. 22), and The Mind of the Maker (1941-30, p. 50). Lewis reviews The Mind of the Maker also (1942-17, p. 53), refers to her in "Wain's Oxford" (1943-6, p. 95), and writes her some letters, later collected by W. H. Lewis (1966-4, p. 96).

This text book arranges selections under different modes of development according to the pattern of single paragraphs, two paragraphs, short essays, long essay, student essay. Under the mode of classification appears two paragraphs by C. S. Lewis, "Divisions of Humanity", pp. 199-200, with a vocabulary list; comprehension, rhetorical, and discussion questions; vocabulary exercises; and writing assignments following, pp. 200-201. A brief biography of Lewis and his philosophy of language precedes the selection, p. 199. The passage is the second and third paragraphs of "What Christians Believe" in Broadcast Talks.

In the section on classification and division, a student paper (without any of the teaching devices which accompany Lewis' paper) appears; Liane Frost's "Hobbits and Elves" (p. 257). She contrasts the appearance, habits, and cultures of the two races.

Word of Mouth

Over the years it has been found that the single most frequent reason readers give for their initial knowledge of Mythlore is by the introduction of a friend. If you do enjoy Mythlore and want to help it continue to improve and grow, why not show copies to your friends who might also find it to their interests.

Letter 294, page 377, second footnote. Isaac "Azimov". The correct spelling is Asimov. Dr. Asimov also enjoys reading Professor Tolkien, just as Tolkien enjoyed reading Asimov. See "All and Nothing" in the January 1981 Magazine of Fantasy and Science Fiction, with a brief and excellent essay on re-reading The Lord of the Rings (pages 103-104): "Each time I liked it better than the time before, and on this fifth occasion I clamped restlessly against having it end at all."
