

Mythopoeic Society

mythLORE

A Journal of J.R.R. Tolkien, C.S. Lewis,
Charles Williams, and Mythopoeic Literature

Volume 12
Number 1

Article 2

10-15-1985

Mythopoesis

Sarah Beach

Follow this and additional works at: <https://dc.swosu.edu/mythlore>

Part of the Children's and Young Adult Literature Commons

Recommended Citation

Beach, Sarah (1985) "Mythopoesis," Mythlore: A Journal of J.R.R. Tolkien, C.S. Lewis, Charles Williams, and Mythopoeic Literature: Vol. 12 : No. 1 , Article 2.

Available at: <https://dc.swosu.edu/mythlore/vol12/iss1/2>

This Column is brought to you for free and open access by the Mythopoeic Society at SWOSU Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Mythlore: A Journal of J.R.R. Tolkien, C.S. Lewis, Charles Williams, and Mythopoeic Literature by an authorized editor of SWOSU Digital Commons. An ADA compliant document is available upon request. For more information, please contact phillip.fitzsimmons@swosu.edu.

To join the Mythopoeic Society go to:
<http://www.mythsoc.org/join.htm>

SWOSUTM

Mythcon 51: A VIRTUAL “HALFLING” MYTHCON

July 31 - August 1, 2021 (Saturday and Sunday)

<http://www.mythsoc.org/mythcon/mythcon-51.htm>

Mythcon 52: The Mythic, the Fantastic, and the Alien

Albuquerque, New Mexico; July 29 - August 1, 2022

<http://www.mythsoc.org/mythcon/mythcon-52.htm>

Abstract

Discusses heroes and heroines in fantasy as Types and as symbols of the Quest.

Additional Keywords

Fantasy—Techniques; Heroes; Heroines; Patrick Wynne

Mythopoesis

A Column by Sarah Beach

Down the ages there have been two important Types of characters in storytelling: heroes and heroines. The Hero was the character the storyline followed, relating his trials and victories. The Heroine was the character the Hero loved, won, and came home to. Joseph Campbell in The Hero With a Thousand Faces (Princeton University Press: 1973) explicates what he calls the "monomyth" of the Hero, the pattern of the Hero's quest and the type of events which he encounters. Much, indeed, has been written on Heroes. Much less has been said about Heroines. Ralph Tynms in The Double in Literature (Bowes & Bowes: 1949) makes these observations of two Types of the Heroine:

The blue-eyed, fair-haired, light complexioned one is the Fair Maiden, alias the Persecuted Maiden, the Virgin, the Saint, the Pale Lady, the Good Woman, the Nice Girl, the Marriageable Young Lady. Sometimes she is simply known as Wife. Her darker counterpart is the Femme Fatale, alias the Temptress, the Vamp, the Sinner, the Dark Lady, the Bad Woman, the Naughty Girl, the Trollop. Sometimes she is called Mistress or Prostitute or Eve or Whor of Babylon, depending on circumstances. (DL, p.126)

This is, of course, an extreme and simple analysis of the two Types of Heroine, for both have positive and negative presentations. Additionally the Heroine can appear in the three-form possibilities of Maiden, Matron and Hag. So often, for the Storyteller, the Heroine serves to depict some element or quality the Hero needs to deal with. Indeed, Maud Bodkin observes in Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (Oxford University Press: 1963) that

It is in the process of fantasy that the contemplated characters of things are broken from their historical setting and made available to express the needs and impulses of the experiencing mind. (APP, p.7)

If the sub-Creator is using his Heroes and Heroines in order to examine the nature of something, then perhaps the gender of the characters has little to do with their function. Perhaps it is only tradition that sets the pattern.

If gender is not important to the functions of Heroes and Heroines, what qualities are important? Campbell calls his perception of the Hero a "monomyth", which indicates a singular quality to the function of the Hero, no matter what personality is given the Hero. Campbell's study deals with the elements of the Hero's quest and its progress. By this we can determine that the Hero represents the quality of action. Using Tynn's observations, we can begin to perceive the quality represented by the Heroine, a quality which we might call the "essence". The Heroine usually represents for the Hero the essences of love or wisdom or socialization.

The Hero's quest is the quest of Self, and traditionally the Hero's union with the Heroine at the end signified reintegration in Society. The Hero's quest springs up in isolation, alienation and exile, and if in the story it is an isolation, from Society, in the character it is an isolation from the Self. Campbell observes

From the standpoint of the way of duty, anyone in exile from the community is a nothing. From the other point of view, however, this exile is the first step of the quest. Each carries within himself the all; therefore it may be sought and discovered within. The differentiations of sex, age, and occupation are not essential to our character, but mere costumes which we wear for a time on the stage of the world. The image of man within is not to be confounded with the garments. (HTF, p. 385)

The Quest is an inner one, and as Campbell points out, the form of its main character is merely a costume for the Self.

It might be more helpful, then, to call the two functions of the Quest the Quality of Action and the Quality of Essence, rather than Hero and Heroine, for in recent years, the force of tradition has been weakening. In many recent works, female characters have been assuming the role of "hero", the questor, the active character. Tradition does still hold sufficient sway to keep the other reversal at a minimum: the part of the passive, "essential" anchor is not yet often given to male characters.

What could be provoking this change in the function assigned to female characters? It is not simply the growing social consciousness of the equality of the sexes. By looking at the nature of the Quest and not its characters, we may find a key. Could it be that alienation is so pervasive in modern life that resocialization is deemed irrelevant? Could it be that the quest for Self takes all the importance of meaning in a story, and that therefore female characters (who in addition to traditionally representing "essential" qualities also often represent the sub-conscious) are better suited to the modern quest mode? What ever the actual cause, any Sub-Creator would do well to remember the functions of Hero and Heroine, whether the "Hero" is masculine or feminine. Randal Helms, in Tolkien's World (Houghton Mifflin: 1974) makes these observations of the handling of Heroes in modern works:

A hero is the expression of a culture's ideals about itself, and our ideals about ourselves have all been punctured. Cultural ideals are formulated and understood most efficiently in myths, and we have lost the ability to participate wholeheartedly in mythic belief, lost in fact the key to respond to our culture's central mythic system.... Most contemporary heroic fantasy is vulgar and debasing — struggle against evil, rescue of good — but because those themes are unsupported by a resonant image of

Continued on page 23

44	'LB	Shift theape	N- Stable Hill Evening of 17 April 2555	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door	Thrown in by Tirian
45	LB	Eustace Scrubb	N- Stable Hill Evening of 17 April 2555	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door	Thrown in by a Calormene
46 to 56	LB	Diggle and ten other Dwarfs	N- Stable Hill Evening of 17 April 2555	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door	Thrown and kicked through by Calormenes
57	LB	Jill Pole	N- Stable Hill Early Morning of 18 April 2555	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door	Thrown in by a Calormene
58	LB	Tirian, Rishda, Tarkaan (CN,SL)	N- Stable Hill Early Morning of 18 April 2555	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door	Tirian pulled himself and Rishda inside
59+	LB	Fallen stars	N- Lantern Waste Early Morning of 18 April 2555	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door	Called home by Aslan
60+	LB	Aslan's followers (Those alive or killed recently)	N- Lantern Waste (Time no longer exists in Narnia by this time)	A- Lantern Waste of New Narnia, beside	stable door (enlarged)	Allowed to enter by Aslan

Mythopoesis, continued from page 8

man: they lack a vital superstructure of ideas. (TW, p.150)

In order to avoid this hollow vulgarity, then, the Sub-Creator must remember that his Hero and Heroine are not simply characters moving through events, but that they are qualities that have meaning for his readers. Although few Authors begin to form their story by focusing on the meaning of what they wish to say, they should not ignore it. The object of the Hero's quest -- on the level of the story's meaning, not its events -- is internal growth, to achieve the spiritual balance which is often represented in the figure of the Heroine. The Heroine serves to call the Hero onward to the completion of the quest.

Admittedly, when one is discussing Types in literature, the exceptions leap to mind, the characters who do not precisely fit the pattern. There are the Heroines who are active participants in the journey of the quest, not simply the reward waiting at the end of the trials; there are the Fair and Dark Heroines who break their Type; the Heroes who skip elements in the quest or who do not achieve self-awareness and resocialization. But these are "made available to express the needs and impulses of the experiencing mind" (APP, p.7).

Campbell has this to say of the meaning of the quest, unfractured by being separated into Hero and Heroine:

The aim is not to see, but to realize that one is, that essence; then one is free to wander as that essence in the world. Furthermore: the world too is of that essence. The essence of oneself and the essence of the world: these two are one. Hence separateness, withdrawal, is no longer necessary. Wherever the hero may wander, whatever he may do, he is ever in the presence of his own essence -- for he has the perfected eye to see. There is no separateness. Thus, just as the way of the social participation may lead in the end to a realization of the All in the individual, so that of exile brings the hero to the Self in all. (HTF, p. 386)

How the Author handles his characters, the depth of recognition he shows as to what his characters represent in the tale, can affect how honestly and freely he deals with them in the telling of the story. The Author's understanding can give the Hero and Heroine (or those who are filling their functions) the free rein they need in order to achieve the quest. But a failure -- whether conscious or sub-conscious -- to understand the Qualities of Hero and Heroine will only cripple the characters. The stronger grasp an Author's awareness has of this truth, the surer touch it will have in breathing life into the questors, the Heros and Heroines.