A Little Liaison

by H. Bruce McEver

A failing moon rises between the twin spires of a ghostly Cologne cathedral that loom over the old Roman city on the Rhine like great spaceships that never got home.

I meet the wife of an old friend at a nearby cafe.
She is with a date
who's brought her flowers and an obsequious grin.

She tells me her husband's enterprise struggles in the east.
He spends too much time there.
She tennises at ten, there's a new apartment in Nice, a new Mercedes, and yes . . . her new friend.

I remember their wedding day in Paris and the incredibly handsome pair; also, their first child pinned in a blue blanket to contain him while daddy ran a smelter in Tennessee.

I excuse myself early and walk a damp stone-inlaid street of antique dealers who sell without sin the freshly unearthed shards of their Roman past.

Like little European affairs and those twin gothic spires that took six hundred years to build, we blacken
with our burning of coal.
