Quanah Parker 1849-1911

Marjorie Snowden North
They called him half-breed and the connotations were good or bad, depending on your side of the fence, but true at any rate;
Cynthia was his mother’s name, Nacona his father’s.
Both fearless and feared, respected and sometimes — but not always — loved, he did what he had to do in defense of his territory, his people.

Government made peace treaties but Quanah knew no peace for his way of life was being eroded like prairie winds beating at sandhills; ideals were being scattered like grains of sand, irretrievable, buffalo disappearing, land swallowed up by fences and railroads and settlements and by pale-faced men with tight cloth trousers and wide-brimmed Stetsons and ropes and firearms.

The stage was set and young Quanah stepped out with his band of Kwahadis to meet the challenge, raided wagon trains, ranches, frontier towns, plundered, killed, shook defiant fists in reality’s face until the Red River War, 1874, 1875.
The Army’s orders: keep the red ones moving, no time for rest, no time to hunt food, no time for horses to graze, no time for peace.
Brutal weather, cold rains, snowstorms white and blinding, shivering, bone-weary humans-turned-animal, the chase grueling for red man and white man alike, survival imperative for one, victory for the other.
“The Wrinkled-Hand Chase” red men would call this campaign later, and it ended one day at Ft. Sill, June 2, 1875, Surrender.

But Quanah was not one to sit, and in the final analysis, not one to hold grudges.
Presidential appointments came and the white man’s fiercest adversary became a reconciler, peacemaker between two great races whose blood surged, intermingled in his own veins.
