12-15-2018

Looking as They Should

Philip Wexler

Abstract
On the ferry to the Stockholm Archipelago, Gunilla
Looking as They Should

by Philip Wexler

On the ferry to the Stockholm Archipelago, Gunilla, no child herself, told me her husband was eighty. They’d weathered other marriages and were newlyweds. He opened the door before she could turn the key. He was expecting me. “I’m eighty, you know, can you believe it?”

I didn’t have to feign astonishment. He led us to the patio in back, where he set down on a tray the frosty bottle of Aquavit and three tumblers. “You know,” he said, pointing a shaky finger at the sunset, the water, and the closest island, “When I was young...notice I did not say younger...I would look out at the water, a different water, and dream of Swedish girls.” We all laughed, but not in disbelief. He stroked his bushy beard, a touch of black still on the chin. “It’s true, you know,” he added soberly. “And I of Swedish boys,” remarked Gunilla with an impish smile.

“I’m well aware,” he said. “Yes, Anders, I know you are, but I said it for the benefit of our visitor.”
“So you did. Now why don’t we offer him a seat?”

They insisted I take the solitary chair. They’d grab two more presently. We toasted to the sunset.

They stood hand in hand looking as they should.