Irises Planted on a Grave

By Gordon Grice

The irises lick the wind with fragrant tongues, Wound the sultry noon
with their purples, jostle their creaking leaves, spread like rumors under the soil, root in the graves of my ancestors, choke out the roses,
grow brash and crowd the grass, poke their twisted tips to hide the names on headstones.
After a rain, their lips are wet and parted to speak.
